"SURYA NARAYAN PANDEY" Was really a bright light. Tall handsome always smiling and humble, MY JIJAJI. I always looked upon him and admired him. In Gorakhpur I had a pooja room to myself, when ever I prayed I wished to God to make me a man like him. Whenever I was in trouble I always found him next to me. When I was in the hospital with my cardiac problems, he sat next to me for days together and telling me stories and urging me to fight. I should have been there in his last journey at least , but I regret I couldn't. I really didn't know wether I would have made it there alone. I know now that he has become Paramatma he will know that I really loved and respected him. I'll miss him to my last breath. Rabin.

“ Jijaji came into my life as a breath of fresh air, a new stylish, well dressed, handsome new family member, liked and respected by all. He helped me grow up into who I became. He taught me to concentrate on myself and make myself bigger and better, rather than look at others to lessen them. He taught me how to be positive and improve myself. He taught me the importance of good company and to stay away from the wrong kind. These are lessons that have been invaluable for me. One incident I remember clearly. At the market in Vadodra I haggled a seller down to five rupees from 25, for a side table made of moulded wood. The table was clearly worth a lot more than the five rupees I paid. On returning home as I was proudly boasting of my achievement, jijaji said with a pained expression - this person obviously came from a village having spent days making this table. Instead of going home empty handed he agreed to take your five rupees instead, likely to buy essential food for his family for the day. You should not have pressurised the poor person and taken advantage of his situation. You should pay a fair wage for fair work. That was a lesson which I have held dear since. Jijaji lived a very honourable life, completely upright, unbending in his morals despite facing the most difficult circumstances, all of which he faced stoically with great fortitude. He was very kind, considerate to all and humble, never boasting of his many achievements. May the powers above look after him.
